

Faeonix Lore

Faeonix is far too young, far too reckless, and entirely too convinced the world belongs to her.

Born into one of the oldest and most influential fox clans beneath the heavens, she is the youngest heir—and though almost no one outside the fox clans knows it, the future Empress of all foxes.

Unfortunately for everyone involved...

Fae has absolutely no interest in becoming their Empress.

Raised behind walls of jade and silk, she wanted for nothing except freedom. Servants catered to her every whim, priceless treasures filled her chambers, and powerful guardians watched her every waking moment.

To everyone else, she was adored.

To Fae, she was imprisoned.

Every friendship was carefully chosen. Every lesson was designed to prepare her for a throne she never wanted. Even her future husband had already been selected through political arrangement before she was old enough to object.

She hated every moment of it.

So one day, with all the confidence only a spoiled young fox could possess, she proudly declared:

“Fine! I’ll become Empress anyway!”

Just not their Empress.

She would build her own empire, earn her own throne, and rule because she chose to—not because her family expected it.

Then she ran away.

Naturally, everyone assumed it was another childish tantrum.

Even now, whenever Fae introduces herself as the future Empress, people laugh.

No one realizes she is, in fact, telling the truth.

They simply misunderstand which throne she intends to claim.

—

Accompanied by the dragon guardian gifted to her since childhood, Fae vanishes into the jianghu, where she quickly discovers freedom, danger, and an endless supply of opportunities to create both.

She steals rare treasures simply because they sparkle.

She challenges cultivators far stronger than herself because they look arrogant.

She rushes headfirst into trouble with alarming consistency.

She rescues strangers without expecting thanks, then insists she only did it because “future Empresses must maintain a good reputation.”

Whether people remember her as a hero or an insufferable little menace usually depends on which side of her latest adventure they found themselves.

One feature, however, makes her impossible to forget.

A strip of pristine white silk is almost always tied across her eyes.

Many assume she is blind.

Others whisper it is a curse, the price of a forbidden technique, or the mark of some ancient prophecy.

Fae never bothers correcting them.

She can see perfectly well.

The blindfold is one she chose to wear.

By denying herself sight, she has sharpened every other sense to an extraordinary degree. She feels the shifting wind, hears the smallest change in breathing, follows the flow of qi, and senses disturbances in the world long before others notice them. What began as stubborn self-imposed training has become one of her greatest strengths.

By the time the blindfold comes off...

Most fights are already over.

Like all fox spirits, Fae also hides her true identity behind countless disguises, preferring to become another wandering cultivator rather than reveal the noble fox hidden beneath.

—

During her travels, Fae meets another mysterious fox spirit named Weiyun.

Unlike Fae, Weiyun grew up beyond the reach of the great fox clans. She answers to no elders, no noble houses, and no imperial court. She simply lives as she pleases.

To Fae, Weiyun is fascinating.

She had never imagined a fox spirit could simply... live.

No expectations.

No arranged future.

No throne waiting to swallow her whole.

The two quickly become inseparable, united by their love of adventure, mischief, and freedom. Through Weiyun, Fae begins to wonder if there might truly be another path besides the one her family chose for her.

What neither of them realizes is that the fox clans are quietly changing.

Ancient rivalries between the great fox families have begun resurfacing beneath centuries of carefully maintained peace. Old alliances are cracking, hidden factions are moving in the shadows, and rogue fox spirits are no longer being ignored.

Someone is gathering them.

Some return willingly.

Others disappear without a trace.

Watching these events unfold is the wandering cultivator Gnsyliuba.

Known throughout the jianghu as an eccentric yet remarkably accomplished master, she seems to drift wherever fate carries her, collecting disciples and stumbling into mysteries with suspicious regularity.

Rarely seen far from her side is GNS, a mysterious fox spirit whose strength rivals legends.

The two women have traveled together for years.

Whether they are cultivation partners, sworn companions, lovers, or something that transcends such labels is known only to them. They offer no explanations, yet the quiet understanding between them often makes words unnecessary.

Most assume they simply wander the jianghu together.

The truth may be far more complicated.

Rumors quietly suggest that GNS is searching for rogue fox spirits, gathering them before the unrest among the fox clans erupts into open conflict. If so, traveling beside one of the jianghu's most respected wandering masters would be the perfect cover.

No one would question why they always seem to appear wherever rogue foxes are found.

Least of all Fae.

Completely unaware of her master's connection to the fox clans, Fae eventually decides that Gnsyliuba is worthy enough to become her shifu.

Much to everyone's surprise...

Gnsyliuba agrees.

What begins as amused curiosity slowly becomes genuine mentorship. Behind her playful smile lies a cultivator of extraordinary wisdom—someone who seems to understand Fae better than Fae understands herself.

Fae believes meeting her master was pure chance.

She has no idea Gnsyliuba and GNS may have been watching her long before they ever met.

Nor does she realize that every lesson, every journey, and every seemingly chance encounter is quietly steering her toward the destiny she has spent her entire life trying to escape.

Because while Fae dreams of becoming an Empress of her own...

She has also been running from the throne that has always belonged to her.